INTRODUCTION.

The present volume of Treitschke's History covers little more than the ten years beginning with the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, which was convened in 1817 by the four Powers forming the Grand Alliance to consider the restless state of reconstituted France and the already uncertain fate of the Bourbons. These years gave to Germany a period of calm after the great storm. One State was dominant in that country of many sovereignties at that time—Austria, as one statesman dominated German policy both at home and abroad—Metternich, Austria's Chancellor.

To say that is to give the key to the political events of an unfruitful epoch of national weariness and disillusionment. In the place of the dissolved Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, Metternich had secured a fictive confederation of the States, not as loose in constitution as the union which Napoleon had destroyed, but equally powerless, and in it he had preserved inviolate the hegemony of Austria. He had successfully thwarted the constitutional aspirations of the time, not by the open and straightforward method of binding the Sovereigns and Governments—at least at the beginning—to an attitude of flat resistance, but more astutely by uniting them in the acceptance of a vague and shadowy promise of concessions which might mean much or little, as each kinglet or princeling wished, yet which he intended to mean nothing at all.

Now all his efforts were directed towards the one task of pressing Germany back into the morass of political obscurantism out of which she had seemed for a moment to have rescued herself. Understanding the conditions of this task better than his tools and dupes, he saw that reaction would be the more certain the more he could win over the States to a policy of inaction. That was the secret of the calculated omission of any reference whatever to times and seasons in the article of the Federal Act of June 8, 1815, which dealt with the future
